MEN'S EDITION · A COURSE ON PAPER

All the Way Here.

Get your attention back. Then lead with it, at home and at work.

The Focus Protocol · Return · Lead · Keep

Write in it. Mark it up. Come back to it when life gets loud.

WHAT IS INSIDE

The 72 hour Focus Protocol and nine lessons in three movements, each one at home and at work, with room to write on every page. Use the online course for a quick read. Use this book for the work.

START HERE

How it fits together.

One man, one system, every room. The same three things decide how you show up at home, at work, and with yourself: where your attention goes, how you carry pressure, and whether you have a life outside your roles. You do not need to finish everything. You need to try a practice in a normal week and keep the ones that help.

01 The Focus Protocol
Three days, four small moves, before you ask anyone else to change anything.

02 The nine lessons
Return, Lead, Keep. One idea and one practice each, shown at home and at work.

03 The Resource Pack
One sheet per lesson, numbered to match. Each one lives where the moment happens: the glovebox, the desk, the nightstand.

04 The weekly board
Fifteen minutes on Sunday to plan the week, with whoever shares your life or on your own.

The order

1 Start the Focus Protocol today
Do not make every boundary permanent on day one.

2 On day four, open Return
One lesson a week. Try it at home and at work. Print that lesson's sheet.

3 Write here what actually happened
Not what should have happened.

4 End with the Thirty Day Page
Keep two practices. Let the rest wait without guilt.

The promise you are making

> I do not trade presence for distraction. My attention belongs to the people who count on me. My phone is a tool. I am not.

START HERE · THE 72 HOUR FOCUS PROTOCOL

Control the inputs. Choose the attention.

A short experiment in changing your surroundings. Cut down what pulls at you, add enough friction to notice the reflex, and make a different choice. Willpower has very little to do with it.

01 Remove the color

Make the phone less visually demanding.

Switch the display to grayscale for the 72 hour experiment. Removing the color puts a small speed bump between the impulse and the tap.

Make it fit: Turn color back on when it is genuinely needed for work, maps, photos, health, or accessibility.

02 Control the feeds

Choose which inputs reach you during the reset.

Delete or sign out of the few apps you open without deciding. Keep essential tools. You are noticing the reflex. Nobody is asking you to live without a smartphone.

Make it fit: Use a browser or scheduled desktop window if an app is required for work or caregiving.

03 Silence the machine

Let people reach you without letting every platform interrupt you.

Turn off nonessential notifications. Keep priority calls, texts, medical alerts, authentication, and anything a caregiver truly needs.

Make it fit: Set navigation before the car moves and keep the phone out of your hand while driving. A notification is never worth a downward glance on the road.

04 Give the phone a home

Protect one repeated moment instead of policing the whole day.

Try a clear arrival rule: when you get home, the phone goes to one drawer, bag, or charging station instead of following you from room to room. If all evening is unrealistic, protect dinner, bedtime, a game, or the Sunday Board Meeting. Adults model the boundary first.

Make it fit: Allow priority contacts and tell people how to reach you. Shorten or move the window when work, health, accessibility, or caregiving requires it.

START HERE · WHAT THE 72 HOURS CAN FEEL LIKE

Know the hard part before you reach it.

0 to 6 — The phantom reach
Your hand goes to the pocket with no thought behind it. You will catch yourself unlocking a phone you had no reason to unlock. Nothing is wrong. You are simply meeting a habit you have never had to look at directly.

6 to 18 — The boredom
This is the hard part and it is the part most people quit in. Small gaps in the day that used to be filled are suddenly empty, and empty feels worse than it should. The urge to check will be strong and it will feel reasonable. It passes.

18 to 36 — The settle
The noise drops. Most people notice they are reaching less, that a task holds them longer, and that falling asleep gets easier. You did not fix yourself. There is just less arriving.

36 to 72 — The room gets bigger
Conversations run longer. You hear the second half of what someone says instead of the first half. The reflex is still there and it is quieter. This is the part worth keeping.

When the old habit starts negotiating

The seventy two hours end and your head starts negotiating. It sounds reasonable, it sounds like you, and it shows up almost word for word.

“I proved I can handle it.”
“Just one app. Not the bad ones.”
“Ten minutes is not the same thing.”
“It was a crazy week. This was not a fair test.”

> Every one of those is the habit asking for its old conditions back. Hold the setup for fourteen days before you change anything. If an app comes back and the reaching starts again, run the seventy two hours one more time.

Tell one person

Tell one person which sentence you expect to hear from yourself: your wife, a buddy, the guy you lift with. Naming it ahead of time makes it a lot harder to believe later.

START HERE · FIELD NOTES

What did you notice when the phone stopped leading?

Do not grade yourself. Write what changed, where the reflex was strongest, and one boundary worth keeping.

RETURN · LESSON 1.1

The Sanctuary

> Get the open loops out of your head.

A familiar scene

It is 10:40 and the house is finally quiet. You are lying there running the job that slipped, the invoice nobody paid, the thing you told your son you would fix this weekend, and the call you have been putting off for three weeks. None of it is getting done tonight. All of it is getting your attention anyway.

What is happening

A man who leads something carries a lot of open loops: promises to clients, to a team, to his wife, to his kids, to himself. Your head is a good place to make decisions and a terrible place to store them. Every loop you keep up there takes a little attention away from whoever is standing in front of you.

The principle

> Stop using your attention as a filing cabinet. Get it on paper, decide the next move on the few things that matter, and let the rest wait somewhere you can find it.

The practice: A fifteen minute weekly mind sweep

Use paper, not your phone. Write until the page feels honest, then give the important items one next move.

01 Make four spaces
Label them Work, Home, Money and admin, and Me. If something belongs in two places, write it in both.

02 Empty the loops
Write every task, promise, worry, idea, and conversation you have been avoiding. Do not organize while you write. When it slows down, wait a full minute and ask what you are still trying not to forget.

03 Mark the next move
D for Do, C for Choose, T for Talk, R for Release. You do not need a full plan for every item, just the next move.

04 Circle three
Pick no more than three items that deserve real attention this week. Everything else is out of your head and on the page, which is the point.

Make it fit

If fifteen minutes is unrealistic, do five. Miss a week without making it a referendum on your discipline. A practice you can come back to beats one you abandon.

At home

Take the items that touch home to whoever shares the load with you, your wife, a partner, or a co parent. Saying out loud that you have the gutters and the car registration this week does more than you would think. Half the friction in a house is two people each assuming the other one has it.

At work

Run the same sweep on the business every Friday afternoon. Most owners find the item they have been avoiding is the one that would change the most. Put that one at the top of Monday.

> YOUR SHEET · 1.1
> The Brain Dump · Where it lives: The desk, or wherever you actually sit down. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Run one honest mind sweep this week, work and home on the same page. Circle three items and notice what changes when you walk in the door.

FROM CHRIS

I have run a business for twenty years and the loops never stop coming. The page does not make them stop. It keeps them from following me into every room.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

Which loop have you carried the longest, and what is the one next move on it?

RETURN · LESSON 1.2

Focus Mode

> Do the work that moves things before the inbox takes the day.

A familiar scene

You get to the office or the truck at seven with a plan. By 7:04 you have answered three texts, opened your email, and put out a small fire somebody else started. At 4:45 you look up. You were busy all day, and the bid, the hire, the hard decision, the thing that would actually move the business, is still sitting there. Now it rides home with you.

What is happening

Reactive work feels like leadership because it is visible and it never ends. A man who spends every day responding lets other people set his agenda, and the work only he can do keeps sliding to tomorrow.

The principle

> Some work moves things forward and some keeps things running. Both matter. Do the first kind first, while you are fresh, then open the gates.

The practice: One protected target

Choose the target before reactive work begins, then give it a block that fits the day you actually have.

01 Choose it the night before
Write one sentence: Tomorrow matters if I finish ____. Make it concrete enough that you will know when it is done.

02 Pick a block that fits
Twenty five, fifty, or ninety minutes, depending on the work and the life around it. A protected half hour beats a perfect morning you never get.

03 Close the gates
Notifications off, email and messages closed, phone out of reach unless the work truly needs it.

04 Then tend the rest
When the block ends, decide what maintenance matters now. Make that your call, not the inbox's.

Make it fit

If your work is reactive by nature, protect the smallest block you can keep, or name one decision that has to happen before the day ends.

At home

Finishing the right work at work is what keeps it from coming home. The man who got the important thing done is a lot easier to be around at dinner than the man still chewing on it.

At work

Tell your team when your block is. A leader who disappears without warning reads as unavailable. A leader who says he is heads down until 9:30 and then theirs teaches everyone that focused work is how things get built.

> YOUR SHEET · 1.2
> Tomorrow Matters If · Where it lives: The desk, written the night before. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Choose tomorrow's target tonight. Protect one block, then write down what broke into it instead of blaming yourself.

FROM CHRIS

When I protect the first block of my day, I make better decisions and bring less of the business home. When I do not, my family gets the leftovers.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

What is the one piece of work only you can do, and when will you protect time for it this week?

RETURN · LESSON 1.3

The Driveway Pause

> Use the last two minutes before the door on purpose.

A familiar scene

You pull into the driveway still on the last call. Your jaw is tight and you are rehearsing what you should have said. Inside, your kid has been waiting all afternoon to show you something. The first ten seconds through that door are going to belong to the workday or to them.

What is happening

A commute turns into an extension of work. Calls, texts, and replaying the day keep your body moving toward home while your head stays on the job. The first people you see get whatever the day left in you.

The principle

> You do not have to fake a good mood. Notice what you are carrying, decide what belongs to tomorrow, and choose how you walk in before the door opens.

The practice: The parked truck reset

Safety first. Set navigation before you move, keep the phone out of your hand while driving, and do this only once you are parked with the engine off.

01 Park and stop
Engine off. Phone silent and out of your hand. Give yourself two minutes before you open the door.

02 Name what followed you
Say or write the unfinished work, the frustration, or the worry that is still running. Decide what belongs to tomorrow.

03 Slow the exit
Three slow breaths with a longer breath out. Let it mark the line between work and home.

04 Choose the entrance
Phone away. Eye contact. Say hello like you mean it. Let the first ten seconds say you are here.

Make it fit

Work from home: close the laptop, step outside, and come back in through a different door. Walk or ride transit: use a landmark near home as your line.

At home

Tell whoever is inside what this is, once. Two minutes in the truck can look like avoidance. Saying that if you sit out there a minute you are not hiding, you are arriving, clears it up.

At work

The same reset works before a hard meeting, a sales call, or walking onto a job site after bad news. Two minutes, name what you are carrying, choose how you walk in.

> YOUR SHEET · 1.3
> The Driveway Card · Where it lives: The glovebox, because that is where the two minutes happen. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Use the parked truck reset three times this week. Keep it under three minutes and judge it only by how you walk in.

FROM CHRIS

This is one of the first practices I built for myself. I needed a gap between being responsible for a business and being a husband and a dad. The truck turned out to be the right place for it.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

What followed you through the door most often this week, and what did the people inside get?

LEAD · LESSON 2.1

The Emotional Thermostat

> Pause before pressure picks your response.

A familiar scene

Your daughter asks a simple question at the wrong moment and your answer comes out sharper than you meant. Or it is a guy on your team who missed the same thing twice. Either way, everyone in the room heard the edge before anyone knew what kind of day you had, and now the room is arranging itself around your mood.

What is happening

Pressure makes a man louder, colder, or gone. The people who depend on you feel the change before they understand it, at home and at work. Swallowing it does not help, and neither does handing them the raw version.

The principle

> Whoever leads the room sets its temperature, whether he means to or not. You will not stay calm every time. The work is noticing sooner, taking a clean pause, and owning it when you miss.

The practice: Pause, return, repair

Use the shortest move that keeps a hard moment from turning into a bigger one.

01 Pause before the answer
Change your body before you try to change your mind. Stand up, step outside or into another room, and take three breaths with a longer breath out. Sixty seconds. If you can answer with respect after that, do it. If not, say you need a few minutes.

02 Name the return time
Say when you will come back, then keep your word. That is what keeps a pause from feeling like walking out.

03 Come back with one calm sentence
Start with what is true and useful. Not a defense, not a lecture, not a list of what they did wrong.

04 Repair the miss
If you were sharp or shut down, name it without an excuse. Own your part and ask what would help.

Make it fit

If a conversation is unsafe, keeps escalating, or is bigger than a short pause can hold, step away and get real outside help. This practice is not a substitute for counseling or crisis support.

At home

Agree on the pause before you need it, when nothing is wrong. Tell your wife or your kids that if you say you need ten minutes, you are coming back, and you will tell them when. Then come back.

At work

The same move works with a team: tell them you want to give this a better answer than the one you have right now, and you will pick it up at two. Leaders who pause before they speak get trusted with harder conversations.

> YOUR SHEET · 2.1
> Pause, Return, Repair · Where it lives: The nightstand, or the desk drawer at work. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Write your pause sentence and your repair sentence. Use the first at the earliest sign of heat, once at home and once at work this week.

FROM CHRIS

I do not always catch it in time. That is why repair matters to me. Looking composed was never the point. Owning it and coming back is.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

Where did pressure choose your response this week, and what would repair look like?

LEAD · LESSON 2.2

The Date Night Experiment

> Plan something new, and leave the phones in the truck.

A familiar scene

You finally get a night out and spend the first twenty minutes deciding where to go. At dinner both phones keep showing up next to the plates. Nothing is wrong. It just feels like another item on the calendar instead of a chance to actually see each other.

What is happening

Most men plan their work better than their marriage. Dates turn into the same restaurant and the same conversation about the kids and the schedule, with half your attention still on the phone. The routine is not the problem. Divided attention and nobody taking the lead is.

The principle

> Do something new, do it side by side, and keep the phones out of it. Take the lead on the planning without taking over the night.

The practice: Choose, protect, notice

Plan one experience that fits your money, your energy, the babysitter, and the life you actually have.

01 Bring two ideas
Each of you brings two. Pick one that feels possible, not impressive. A walk somewhere new counts as much as a big night out.

02 Handle the logistics
Sitter, reservation, time, gas in the truck. That is the part that kills most dates before they happen. Carry it.

03 Phones out of reach
Silenced and in the glovebox before you sit down. Allow priority contacts if the kids are with a sitter, and agree that either of you can check only for a real reason.

04 Notice, do not grade
Afterward ask what was interesting and what you would do again. The night does not have to prove anything about your marriage.

Make it fit

Use an at home, free, or low cost version. Twenty intentional minutes on the back porch can count when a full evening cannot.

At home

Taking the lead on a date is not about being in charge. It is about lifting a load. When she does not have to plan, book, and remind, she gets to just show up, which is usually the whole gift.

At work

Novelty and shared activity work on a team too. A morning on a job site together, a volunteer day, or lunch somewhere new does more for a crew than another meeting about culture.

If you are not with someone right now

Take the same practice to one relationship that matters to you: one of your kids, your brother, your dad, an old friend. Plan something new, put the phones away, do it side by side, and ask afterward what you would do again. The skill is the same. Only the person changes.

> YOUR SHEET · 2.2
> The Date Night Card · Where it lives: The wallet, so the idea survives the week. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Plan one modest shared experience in the next fourteen days. Handle the logistics. End with one question: what part should we do again?

FROM CHRIS

Forget the perfect date. What helps is getting out of autopilot long enough to notice the person across from you.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

When did you last plan something new for her, start to finish, and what got in the way since?

LEAD · LESSON 2.3

The Floor General

> Get to their level and let them lead.

A familiar scene

Your kid says your name, or Dad, watch this. They look for your eyes before they look for an answer. If the phone gets the first response, that little invitation closes before either of you notices.

What is happening

A man can spend a whole evening near his kids and not really be with them. A downward glance tells a kid the screen got there first, even when that is not what you mean. And even when you do play, it is easy to take it over: fix the game, teach the lesson, run the show.

The principle

> You set the safe conditions. They lead. The floor just means getting to their level and following for a while, which is the opposite of how most of us lead all day.

The practice: Eyes first, then follow

Answer the bid before anything else. Phone away, get close, and follow instead of directing.

01 Give them your eyes first
Set the phone down, look at them, and answer. If you truly cannot stop, say exactly when you can and keep that promise.

02 Get to their level
The floor, beside them on the couch, across the table, or the passenger seat. Whatever puts you in their world.

03 Let them choose
Ask what they want to do or talk about. Resist improving the game, teaching a lesson, or steering toward what you would rather do.

04 End cleanly
Give a heads up when time is almost up. Tell them what you liked and when you can do it again.

Make it fit

Five minutes counts on a crowded day. With teenagers, drive, cook, fix, fish, or work beside them, and let silence be fine instead of turning it into an interview.

At home

Cover for each other. Fifteen minutes on the floor only happens if somebody else is holding the rest of the evening. Trade it back the next night.

At work

Leaders need this too. Fifteen minutes with a newer person on your team where they set the agenda and you listen, without fixing anything, tells them more about how you see them than any review will.

If there are no kids at home

Point it at someone you lead or mentor: a younger guy at work, a nephew, a kid on a team you coach. Same rules. Eyes first, let them lead, do not take over. Most of the men who mattered to you growing up did exactly this.

> YOUR SHEET · 2.3
> Floor Time · Where it lives: The kid's room. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Use one ten minute Eyes First window this week. Answer the invitation, put the phone away, and follow without teaching, fixing, or interviewing.

FROM CHRIS

I called it Floor General, but most of it is giving up command. I set the conditions. They show me where connection is possible.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

When your kids reached for you this week, what got your eyes first?

KEEP · LESSON 3.1

The Third Place

> Have one place where you are not the boss, the provider, or the fixer.

A familiar scene

Someone asks what you do for fun and you start listing things you used to do. The bike needs air, the fishing gear has not moved since spring, and the buddy you meant to call is still a name in your phone. You are useful to everyone and getting harder for yourself to recognize.

What is happening

A lot of men end up with two rooms: work and home. Both matter, and neither was built to carry your whole identity, your friendships, and your rest. When those two are all you have, burnout is just high friction with no buffer.

The principle

> The sociologist Ray Oldenburg called it the third place, somewhere outside home and work. Here it means a place or activity you keep returning to where nobody needs you to be in charge. You are just a man doing something he likes.

The practice: Choose one place to return to

It should restore more than it distracts, and it has to be fair to the people you share a life with.

01 Name what restores you
A trail, the water, a workshop, the gym, church, a rec league, a breakfast table, a project with your hands. Not what you think you should like. What actually gives you something back.

02 Start with the smallest real version
A standing thirty minutes is fine. A place becomes yours by returning to it, not by big blocks of time.

03 Clear it at home
Put it on the shared calendar, count childcare and money honestly, and protect her time to recharge as seriously as yours.

04 Notice what comes home
Ask whether you come back more alive and available, or just numb and avoiding things. Adjust honestly.

Make it fit

Some seasons need a smaller version closer to home. Some problems need sleep, a lighter workload, medical care, or counseling. A hobby will not cure burnout.

At home

Do not let it become your escape and her extra shift. Equal time, agreed out loud, childcare counted honestly. A third place that costs your wife her Saturday is not restoring anybody.

At work

Business owners lose this one first, because the business is always open. A standing Tuesday ride or a Saturday morning on the water is how you keep from becoming only the job.

> YOUR SHEET · 3.1
> The Third Place · Where it lives: The bag you already carry. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Go back to one place or activity twice this month. After each time, ask whether you came home more alive, more available, or just numb.

FROM CHRIS

Mountain biking, fishing, kettlebells, a ride on a forest road. They are not credentials. They are where I remember I am a person before I go back to the people who need me.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

Where do you feel like yourself, and when did you last go?

KEEP · LESSON 3.2

The Friendship Script

> Invite first, and make it easy to say yes.

A familiar scene

You have known him for three years. You see him at the gym, at church, at the kids' games. Every time, one of you says you should get together. Neither of you is saying no. It is just waiting for somebody to name a day.

What is happening

A lot of men's friendships fade quietly after thirty. Nobody decided that. Work and family filled the calendar and nobody made the invitation. Waiting for friendship to happen keeps it theoretical.

The principle

> Men tend to build friendship shoulder to shoulder: a shared activity, low stakes, and repetition. One or two men you can call matter more than a big network. Somebody has to invite first. Let it be you.

The practice: The specific invitation

One man, one activity, one time. Keep it simple enough that a no does not feel like a verdict.

01 Pick one man
Someone you respect or already like being around. You do not have to decide whether he will be a close friend.

02 Make it concrete
I am riding Saturday at eight, want to come? Or: I am grabbing breakfast after the game, join me?

03 Ask again without chasing
Schedules are real. Ask again another week if the first answer is no. Respect a pattern of no without taking it personally.

04 Let it go deeper later
Start side by side. When there is trust, ask a real question and answer one honestly yourself.

Make it fit

If distance or health limits what you can do, use a standing call, a project check in, or breakfast once a month. Repetition matters more than the setting.

At home

Your marriage was never meant to be your only close relationship. A wife who is also your only friend is carrying a job she did not sign up for. Friends make you a better husband.

At work

The same script works with a peer you respect: another owner, a mentor, someone a few years ahead of you. A specific breakfast invitation is how most of the best business relationships start.

> YOUR SHEET · 3.2
> The Friendship Script · Where it lives: The wallet. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Send one concrete invitation today. If it is a no, ask once more another week before you decide what it means.

FROM CHRIS

I do not need a big network. I need a few men I can call, and that starts with me being willing to ask.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

Who have you been waiting on, and what stops you from asking him first?

KEEP · LESSON 3.3

Mission Debrief

> Keep the two practices that helped.

A familiar scene

You are on the last lesson and real life is already back. This is where a course usually becomes one more file you finished. Instead of collecting nine ideas, you pick the two that deserve to live past this screen.

What is happening

A course turns into a pile of information fast. Finishing every page does not matter if none of it survives a normal week.

The principle

> This was always about coming back, not finishing. Pick the few practices that met a real problem, use them long enough to learn something, and let the rest wait.

The practice: Two practices for thirty days

Look back at the Focus Protocol and the eight practices and choose two. Make each one specific enough to use.

01 Name the real problem
What is costing you the most right now: the noise in your head, reactive days, bringing work home, your temper, distance at home, or being alone?

02 Choose two
One that helps you Return and one that helps you Lead or Keep. More is not better.

03 Set the minimum
Write when, where, and how small each practice can get on a bad week without disappearing.

04 Review without a scorecard
In thirty days, ask what changed, what did not fit, and what you want to keep. Do not turn your home into a compliance report.

Make it fit

If a practice creates conflict, shame, or more management than value, stop and redesign it. Get professional help when the problem is bigger than a course.

At home

Tell someone at home which two you picked. Not so they can grade you. So they can notice.

At work

Make one of your two show up at work as well: the pause before a hard meeting, a protected first block, or a clean pause in a tense conversation.

YOUR SHEET · 3.3

The Thirty Day Page · Where it lives: The desk, or the table at home. Print it from the Resource Pack and put it where the moment happens.

Try this week

Choose two practices for thirty days. Give each one a situation, a response, and a minimum. Review what happened without grading your character.

FROM CHRIS

Keep the two things that helped. The rest will be here when you need it. If you want someone asking you about them at day fifteen, that is what coaching is for.

THE QUESTION I WOULD ASK YOU ON A CALL

Which two are you keeping, and who is going to ask you about them at day fifteen?

KEEP · THE LAST PAGE

Keep the parts that held up.

Do not keep every practice because you paid for the course. Choose two that meet a problem you actually have, and give each a moment, a response, and a smallest version for a bad week. Make at least one of them show up at work.

> There is no perfect finish. Notice sooner, repair faster, and keep coming back to the life in front of you.
